BAD ACOUSTICS DUE TO REVERBERATION

Bad acoustics, writer Jacob Mazer, in the May Case and Comment, are chiefly due to excessive reverberation and echoes, caused by the sound waves continuing in the room for several seconds after the source of sound has ceased. Reverberation is closely related to the generally known phenomenon of echo.

For the listener to hear distinctly, each syllable of the speaker must disappear almost entirely before the arrival of the next syllable. When the reverberation, which is due to the reflecting power of the walls, ceiling and other surfaces in a room, continues too long, it produces confusion and indistinctness. A room may also be defective on account of an insufficient amount of reverberation, for some reverberation is essential to the production of sufficient volume. With too little reverberation, the sound disappears almost immediately after leaving the speaker, and is so feeble that only those close to him can hear it. Therefore it is necessary to good acoustics to produce a condition that will give neither too much nor too little reverberation. In the average acoustically bad auditorium the reverberation usually continues to be heard for periods varying from four to seven seconds. As the average speaker utters about four syllables per second, there is much overlapping of sounds and consequent confusion in hearing in such rooms. The obvious remedy for this condition of excessive reverberation is to cut down the time of reverberation, and that is exactly what is done in correcting a room having this defect. The time to which the reverberation should be reduced is very important; it differs for differ-
